Course description

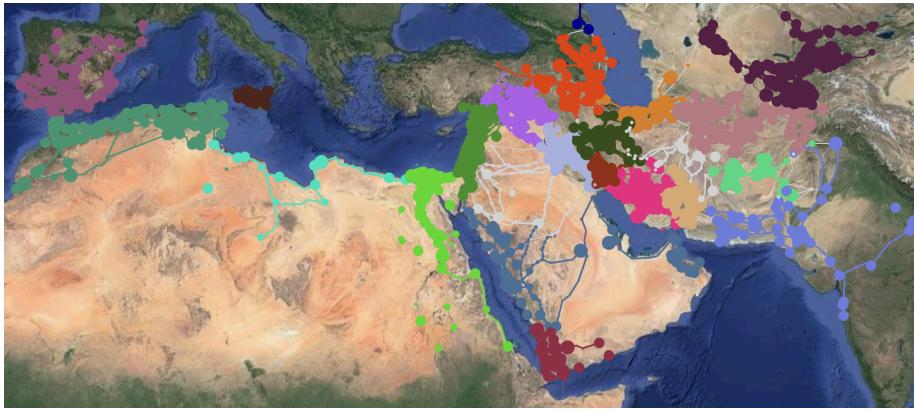

Figure 1: A map of settlements and routes of the medieval Islamic World, Al-Turayyā Project by Romanov M. and Seydi M.

The aim of this course is to provide an introduction to the early and medieval history of the Islamic world, from the rise of Islam in Arabia to the formation of a world civilisation. Students will learn how to relate ideas to historical, geographical, and material factors. Particular attention will be paid to religious and cultural continuity, as a backdrop to the evolution of an Islamic identity and institutions of government, administration, and education.

Intended learning outcomes

1. Students will learn about the most important developments in Islamic history, main questions in the historiography of Islam, and be able to reflect historically and critically about a range of topics related to the way Muslim societies functioned in the past.
2. They will be able to find their way around major reference works for Islamic history and gain some familiarity with some primary sources.

3. They will learn how to write critical essays following the conventions of style and referencing in the field of Islamic history.
4. They will be able to apply the skills and methodological approaches to other subjects of study. They will be able to situate topics from Islamic studies in their historical context.
5. They will gain exposure to innovative approaches to the study of medieval Islamicate history, digital methods and techniques, and will be able to use apply skills in other areas of their interests.

Lectures

Weekly lectures will cover the period from the rise of Islam in Late Antiquity to the decline of the major caliphates and the appearances of new polities ruled mostly by non-Arabs, culminating with the Mongol invasion of the Middle East by the end of the 1250s CE. Each lecture will highlight historiographical issues, which will then be picked up during the seminars.

Seminars

Seminars will follow the themes of the lectures but will expect input from students. For this, in addition to the discussion of secondary sources, students will be expected to engage with short excerpts from primary sources listed in the syllabus. Presentations will also take place during the seminars.

To prepare for the seminars you must read the weekly readings listed first closely as these will provide you with the general framework. Reading these will help you to be more selective about books and articles recommended for further reading. The short primary source readings are also essential for the seminars. All of this will help you with the exams.

Assessment

Essay (50%), open-book exam (30%), presentation (15%), participation (5%).

Essay, of maximum 3000 words. Essay questions will be drawn from the lectures and seminars topics and will be given one week before the submission date. You will be expected to be able to connect several topics and draw upon readings from several weeks, in addition to topic specific readings which will be provided with the questions.

Open-book exam. The questions for open-book exam will be based on the list of books provided in the end of this syllabus. You will be asked to answer one of the questions within three hours, drawing on your knowledge of the course materials. The response must demonstrate a good overall understanding of the topics of Islamic history, an ability to select relevant material, and a close engagement with the selected books that you will have access to during the exam. You will not be penalised for poor referencing, spelling mistakes, and typos.

Presentation. You will choose to present on one of the weekly topics, during one of the seminars. A strong presentation will combine a good understanding of the readings and an engaging and convincing use of material and archaeological evidence.

Participation. It is essential to attend the lectures and seminars. You will be marked on your contributions to class discussions.

Chapter 11

Muslim learning, texts, and the formation of the Islamic World (900-1250)

11.1 Objectives

This session complements students' knowledge of the political developments in the Islamic world, focusing corresponding to the decline of the Abbasid caliphal power in Baghdad, the challenge of the Fāṭimids and the Umayyads of Spain in the West, and the rise of Persian and Turkic dynasties in the East.

The main objective is to provide an introduction to pre-modern Islamicate education practices. Secondary readings are assigned to inform you of the main debates surrounding the role of knowledge and scholarly elite in medieval Islamicate society. Students will read some historical sources and examine manuscript evidence to get a closer understanding of the winterly culture in medieval Arabic and Persian engaging with the following:

- * The basic historical trajectory of educational practices in the Islamic world: origins, developments, and processes of formalization.
- * The role of knowledge networks and institutions of education in the formation of the Muslim world as we know it today.

11.1.1 Further points for discussion:

- The interpretation of primary sources (in English translation) related to practices of education and knowledge transmission.
- How digital methods can complement our reading of narrative sources, with a particular focus on Muslim knowledge transmission.
